Christmas ambulance patients dying or being seriously harmed, says whistleblower

Serious cases could affect as many as 80 patients according to ambulance trust source, after MPs warn delays caused 20 deaths

Patients harmed by delays are being reviewed by the trust though MPs say they could have been prevented by requesting help earlier. Gilly

Forty people are thought to have died or been seriously injured as a result of lengthy delays at one ambulance trust which meant patients were left waiting hours for emergency responders, a whistleblower has said.

On Wednesday, Labour MP for Norwich South Clive Lewis told the House of Commons that a whistleblower in his constituency had warned there had been 20 deaths because of ambulance delays over Christmas.

The final tally of cases of death and serious harm could be as high as 80, according to the whistleblower.

The trust said it was aware of the concerns raised by MPs, but noted that it had not received any complaints from staff, patients or their families.

It confirmed that it experienced "extreme levels of demand" over the 15-day period and was unable to respond to a "small number" of the 50,000 calls it handled as quickly as needed, and added these were being reviewed.

The trust was at its highest level of emergency operations (REAP 4) between 31 December and 9 January, but Mr Lewis noted in his urgent question that it had been "seriously overstretched".
